DISCLOSURES UNFOLDED IN DOCUMENTS, PERSONAL TESTIMONY, OF JERUSALEM TRIAL OF EICHMANN FOR MURDER OF MILLIONS OF JEWS, STIR GUILT, ALSO HORROR AND SORROW IN EUROPE

New stirrings of guilt among West Germans . . . new cries against West German "reactionaries" and "Nazis in government" from the Communist bloc . . . horror and sorrow everywhere that such things could have happened.

These are the general reactions in Europe to the disclosures being unfolded in the documents and personal testimony of the trial in Jerusalem of Adolf Eichmann for the murder of some 6,000,000 Jews, says the New York Herald Tribune. Eichmann the man appears to be of little interest. Nor does there seem any great interest in what will become of him.

The greatest impact has been made on West Germany. A correspondent in West Germany reports on this:

"The Eichmann trial probably has done more than any other thing since the war to create West German interest in the horrors perpetrated by Hitler's Reich. The Nuernberg trials of 1945-'46 came at a time when Germans were still numbered by defeat and overwhelmingly concerned with finding enough to eat. Nuernberg had little effect on the average Germans. Then, as they began to find their feet, Germans seemed to be trying, in hard work, to forget.

"But now there seems really thoughtful concern and regret for what happened, and a desire to make a world in which such a thing will not be repeated.

"Germans are not talking too much about what's coming to light at the Eichmann trial, at least not with strangers. They cannot always know the political past of a stranger, so they usually avoid discussion of the Nazi past.

"Recitals at the trial of the train rides to the death camps and what happened in those camps have hit home to the Germans. Those with guilt in their past — or even only a feeling of guilt for what they let happen — look with caution upon their neighbors, wondering if they are suspected. The guiltless look with suspicion on those who may have something hidden in their background. So there is little public talk about Eichmann or details of the trial.

"Obviously, there must be people who think the Nazis were right. But they remain silent.

"At the political top of West Germany, the main concern still is how the Eichmann trial will affect the German image abroad. A German television interviewer in Jerusalem, for example, asked four German students there, not about the Eichmann atrocities and what they thought of them, but 'Had Israelis cooled toward West Germany since the trial started?'"

Communist East Germany, at least in its press and such public statements as one can obtain, takes the stand that in that part of Germany Nazism was erased long ago, and full atonement made, says the New York Herald Tribune. It points the finger at capitalistic West Germany and beats the propaganda tune that there Nazi criminals still lurk, some cloaked in high office. Eichmann trial accounts are accompanied by constant editorials on this theme.

East Germany's reaction to the Eichmann disclosures is pretty much the same as in the other satellite countries, including Czechoslovakia and Poland, which have figured extensively in the testimony and documentary evidence. The Prague radio and Czech newspapers pound away at the theme that there is yet much evidence, which that country could provide but which it says Israel has refused to accept, proving the guilt of persons still active in West Germany.

Polish radios hit the same theme — but less stridently — as do the Hungarian and other East bloc radio and press. Much of the trial news is published, but as often as not simply as a platform on which to build charges against West Germans.

Poland's statement of the trial has been the least anti-German in its treatment. Long textual accounts of the atrocities recited at the trial have just recently begun appearing in the Polish press. Polish newspapers prior to the trial were filled with criticism of Cologne lawyer, Robert Servatius, for accepting the defense brief for Eichmann, but this criticism seems to have been dropped.

Poles remain sensitive about their pre-war anti-Semitic reputation, and the country's newspapers have given stress to such testimony dealing with efforts of Poles to help Jews escape the Nazi holocaust, says the New York Herald Tribune. Such man-in-the-street reaction as can be tapped seems unanimous in the belief Eichmann should be hanged, but there is little evidence of any great emotional impact on the country.

In Western Europe, most newspapers have moved the story to inside pages but still give it considerable wordage. Like the West German press, newspapers in Britain, France and Italy, as well as the Scandinavian countries, generally let the words of the trial tell the story, with little embellishment or comment and few scare headlines.

In France even the Algerian revolt and the continuing French-Algerian uneasiness did not knock the story of the trial out of the newspapers. It moved to inside pages after the opening day but continues to find up to two columns of print daily in the major newspapers. Frenchmen find little "news" in the trial stories — taking the position they were close to the war and to the Germans and knew what it was like. But questioning of Frenchmen at random discloses that the newspaper accounts are being read with continuing interest.

Frenchmen, like Britons and other Western Europeans, have mixed feelings about the legality of the trial and the manner in which it is being held. But in editorials and public comment there seems majority agreement that the world can stand the reminder of what happened as an incentive to not letting such horror ever visit the world again.

If the reaction of all Europe to the trial of Adolf Eichmann — East and West alike — could be summed up in a sentence, says the New York Herald Tribune, it probably would be: "If it helps us not to forget, then it is good."

The deportation of Rumanian Jewry to extermination camps was described in evidence and documents submitted to the Court, says the Israel Digest. The first witness, Mrs. Perla Mark, widow of the Chief Rabbi of Chernovitsy, gave an eye-witness account of the operation in which her husband and another hundred and fifty Jews were taken to the river and shot. In September 1941, there were 70,000 Jews herded into two narrow streets in the ghetto, and transported from there to death in the Transdniatria concentration camp.

Dr. Theodore Lewinstein-Lavi, who conducts research into the fate of Rumanian Jewry for the Yad Vashem Memorial Authority, described the Transdniatria concentration camp as "our Auschwitz . . . the graveyard of Rumanian Jewry." He estimated that 300,000 Jews, fifty per cent of the Jewish population of Rumania, perished at this camp from hunger, disease or overwork, or in mass shootings.

In one document submitted by Mr. Bach, the German representative in Rumania objected, "in accordance with our agreement with the Mufti" (of Jerusalem, Haj Amin el-Husseini, leader of Arab attacks on Jews in Palestine), to an order by Marshal Antonescu, the Rumanian Premier, that 80,000 Rumanian Jews should be allowed to emigrate.

Another document reveals that Eichmann was willing to release 5,000 Rumanian Jewish children, if 20,000 young Germans were returned by the Allies. He urged that negotiations be conducted rapidly "for technical reasons," i.e. because, as he told his Israeli police interrogator, the Einsatzgruppen "would soon have obliterated those children, if you will pardon so brutal an expression."

The Prosecution then began submitting evidence on Nazi activities in Slovakia, including the statement made by Eichmann's deputy in Hungary, Dieter Wisliceny, while on trial for war crimes. Wisliceny described how Eichmann showed him the "Fuehrer's Order," authorizing the "biological annihilation of the Jewish race", says the Israel Digest. When Wisliceny expressed his horror, Eichmann said, "Don't be sentimental. It's the Fuehrer's order and must be obeyed."

Dr. Ernst Abeles described how the "Jewish shadow cabinet," of which he was a member, negotiated with Wisliceny for the stoppage of deportations in return for payment. This plan met with limited success: deportations ceased for several months, after a payment of $50,000 to Wisliceny. In 1943, the Slovakian Jewish leaders again approached Wisliceny with a proposal to cease all deportations from Europe in return for a large sum of money. Wisliceny, after consulting his superiors, expressed his agreement, in return for two or three million dollars in goods, but said that Polish Jewry was "already lost." The agreement was never implemented. At that time, Hungarian Jewry were negotiating on the stoppage of deportations in return for trucks.

Dr. Bedrich Steiner, who directed the Department of Statistics of the Bratislava Jewish Center during the war, testified that, of the 89,000 Jews of Slovakia, 72,000 perished in extermination camps, and that Jewish property valued at 4,300 million Czech kronen (about $145m.) was confiscated by the Germans and Slovaks.

Dieter Wisliceny had stated, at his trial after the war, that it was well known that the Mufti of Jerusalem was one of the initiators of the "final solution."

Prof. Gustave Gilbert, the American psychologist, who interrogated the Nazi leaders at Nuremberg, talked to Kaltenbrunner on the day that evidence was produced at Nuremberg that babies had been thrown alive into the crematorium at Auschwitz. "Even a psychologist, trained to think coolly and objectively, could not stand this," Professor Gilbert declared, says the Israel Digest. He asked Kaltenbrunner whether he had really known nothing of these horrors and received the reply, "No. No. I really didn't. This was the work of Heydrich and Eichmann and others in that chain of command." Other SS officers also stressed Eichmann's responsibility, in particular Rudolf Hoess, Commandant of Auschwitz.

The last witness on Slovakia, Adolf Rosenberg, described the brutalities in the Sered concentration camp.

Dr. Servatius cross-examined Professor Gilbert as to the possibility of the existence of a conspiracy on the part of the major war criminals to lay the blame on Eichmann. The witness agreed that Goering had tried to organize a conspiracy, but said that the attempt had failed.

Continuing his cross-examination, Dr. Servatius tried to establish that the witness had lost his professional detachment during the Nuremberg trial. Professor Gilbert replied that only "the murderous robots of the S.S." could listen to all these atrocities without the flicker of an eyelash. "There is only one profession in which there is a complete separation between the job and the man, and that is the profession of an S.S. man," he said, reports Israel Digest.

Eichmann's connection with the notorious massacre of the inhabitants of the Czech village of Lidice is shown in documents submitted by the prosecution. One of these is a letter from Krumey, later Eichmann's assistant, asking Eichmann how to deal with 88 children of Lidice. Krumey explains that he applied to Eichmann, although the children were not Jewish, "because I assumed that the children were slated for sonderbehandlung" ("Special treatment," i.e. death). During his interrogation by the Israel Police, Eichmann denied all knowledge of the matter.

Through a series of documents and the evidence of Yitzhak Nehama, of Saloniki, the Prosecution showed how the majority of Greek Jewry was plundered, deported, and exterminated at Auschwitz. Of 56,000 Saloniki Jews sent to the death camp, only 1,900 survived the war.

At one session, Adolf Eichmann made two seriously damaging admissions, says the New York Herald Tribune. One undermines a great many defense documents aimed at proving he was acting under orders in Jewish persecutions. The other helps support the charge that he was the sole and exclusive expert in Jewish affairs under SS (Nazi Elite Guard) security chief Reinhard Heydrich.

In addition, the prosecution went far toward showing that in the 1941 period when Eichmann says he was hoping to see the Jews of Europe settled on the island of Madagascar he already knew they were to be physically exterminated in Europe.

Eichmann fought hard to stave off defeat on these points, and indeed he succeeded in blunting and frustrating Attorney General Gideon Hausner on other embarrassing questions during five and a half hours of a stubborn, wrangling, wearying cross-examination.

The first of the points Mr. Hausner scored apparently was one that had been well prepared in advance. He was able triumphantly to establish that all the letters, orders, messages, memoranda and everything else — whether major or trivial — signed by Eichmann during all his years in section IVB4 of the SS secret service bore the code notation I. A., standing for "im auftrage," which was translated as "in assignment."

That meant Eichmann could no longer pretend that letters, orders, and the like, bearing the I. A. code, meant these were prepared on direct instructions from superiors — as assignments.

The implication which had been left by the defense during the trial was that these I. A. intials proved in a documentary way that some administrative superior of Eichmann had the major responsibility for the matter in hand.

But now Eichmann was forced to admit that an administrative regulation of the Gestapo for many years standing required that the initials be put on everything he or any other section head signed, says the New York Herald Tribune, no matter how trivial or no matter whether any superior had seen and okayed it or not.

This came as a great blow to Eichmann, all the more so because Mr. Hausner was able to call him a liar again, but this time with proof. The prosecutor slipped the question into an examination on another subject, catching Eichmann flat-footed.

But he tried hard to squirm out of it, and ended up still trying to claim it as proof for himself, even while admitting it was meaningless.

"Even with regard to a simple receipt I would have to write I. A.," he said. "That proves that even the smallest document of least importance I had no right to sign on my own authority."

The second big admission came at the end of the session when the prosecutor pinned on Eichmann that nobody else in the Reich's head security office but himself bore the official title of Expert in Jewish Affairs, or, as it was called in the head security office: R.S.H.A., the Referent for Jewish Affairs.

This is of utmost importance to the prosecution case that Eichmann was an initiator of anti-Jewish persecutions and extermination, and also to the nature of the indictment in charging that he conspired with others.

Eichmann tried without success for over an hour of give-and-take with the prosecutor and judges to claim that others did in fact deal with Jewish affairs. But he was not able to name any one with the official title and sole and exclusive duty of dealing with Jewish affairs.

The Madagascar plan admission was a tangled and confused phase of the examination, and not anywhere near as important to the prosecution as the first two admissions.

Hausner, whose style of cross-examination seemed to suggest his strong awareness of his courtroom audience, constantly tried to demean the prisoner with his characterizations. This is a conspicuous departure from the dignity which had prevailed in the court up to now, says the New York Herald Tribune, and the more Eichmann was needled by Mr. Hausner the more ice-like dignity Eichmann displayed.

When he was called a liar at one point Eichmann responded: "I myself am not fighting for my head or my neck, but I ask to remove the untruth which was heaped upon me for fifteen years."

At another point when answering a question about the Madagascar plan, Eichmann mentioned that when Theodor Herzl, the founder of Zionism, came upon obstacles and difficulties in his way he turned to this idea.

"I suggest that you do not mention names here which you do not deserve to bear on your lips," Mr. Hausner shot at the prisoner.

"Mr. Hausner," interjected presiding Judge Moshe Landau sternly, "I am not sure this remark was justified."

At another time the prosecutor refused to yield the floor to Dr. Robert Servatius, defense attorney, when he rose to make the first interruption since the cross-examination began. Judge Landau ordered Mr. Hausner to yield, and Dr. Servatius, the soul of courtesy himself, made a small protest over Mr. Hausner's use of the word liar, and then asked that Eichmann be allowed to explain himself in answering Mr. Hausner's questions.

Eichmann denied that he participated in a 1939 meeting together with his chief, Reinhard Heydrich, when the latter revealed to commanders of the newly formed execution battalions that physical extermination of the Jews had been decided on.

When Mr. Hausner pointed out that he must have attended this meeting because a particular document said so, Eichmann said he retracted it. And he went further. He said:

"I have to retract a number of other things because certain blun-

The Role Of Law In International Affairs As Illustrated By The Eichmann Case

BY PROFESSOR MILTON KATZ, OF NEWARK, N.J., AUTHORITY ON INTERNATIONAL LAW, WHO WAS CHIEF OF THE MARSHALL PLAN MISSION WITH THE RANK OF AMBASSADOR. THIS PAPER WAS DELIVERED AS THE ERWIN C. CAFFREY MEMORIAL LECTURE, SPONSORED BY THE NEW JERSEY INSTITUTE FOR PRACTICING LAWYERS, AND IS REPRINTED FROM THE NEW JERSEY LAW JOURNAL.

(Concluded from Last Week)

Question: Professor Katz, doesn't Israel take the position in distinguishing the Eichmann case from other cases which they have tried on the basis of the Nuremberg trial, that Eichmann is distinguished from other criminals in his execution or in his killing of six million Jews and Israel is peculiarly the only country that can not only represent Israel and the Jews of Israel but also the Jews of the world who have a particular stake in the final result of the Eichmann trial?

Professor Katz: My source of information about Israel's position consists of two things. One is the newspapers and the periodicals. The same sources that you have. The other is two conversations I have had with a legal advisor of the Israeli Foreign Office who is concerned with the international implications of the case. He said nothing to that effect.

I do gather from the newspapers that this position is taken by various Israeli citizens. I do not know what the official position of Israel will be in the actual indictment which will be brought against Eichmann. The only guide I have to what the indictment will say is what the statute says, and the statute defines three groups of crimes, as I told you, crimes against the Jewish people, which might be taken to suggest that they might possibly take the position you have just defined, and the other two: and I would say that we will not know authoritatively what the Israeli position is until we see what the indictment says.

Question: I would like to ask you a question about the first facet of the case. That is the violation of sovereignty of the State of Argentina. It disturbs me just a little bit that where there is in a country a person who is popular to the extent that that country does not wish to assert its rights under international law, that person is left without any remedy under international law. Now, I know that under the traditional view that when you say that, question the view, but some have suggested that there are or ought to be private rights under international law, and I wonder if this isn't an area that points up that need.

Professor Katz: It may well be. I think that the Supreme Court of the United States and the other courts who just said, well, this is not our affair, so to speak, have taken the easy way out. I think that is quite clear.

You see, if Argentina had seen fit to bring a legal proceeding against Israel in an international court, she would have recovered judgment, I assume, because I see no evidence that Israel would seriously have challenged the Argentina contention that international law had been violated. Israel would have conceded this, I think. Then Argentina would have gotten judgment. Then Argentina would have run into a problem familiar to us as lawyers, what would the remedy be? In our own law the usual form of judgment remedy is for damages, you see. In certain cases, you get specific performance, but that isn't the usual remedy.

So that Argentina's claim might well be for reparations in some monetary amount, say fifty thousand or twenty-five thousand dollars for an offense against her sovereignty, and Israel might have paid the judgment. This would still leave Eichmann precisely where he was to start with. Of course, in the world as it is today, people might be kidnapped who are not criminals at all. I can well imagine, for instance, a Communist regime kidnapping a defected Communist and hauling him back for prosecution on a trumped up charge.

I think this is a serious question and it is one of the many questions with respect to which each individual court tends to find its own way out. I am not saying this critically, but we are all lawyers, we all know what courts do. In effect, they tend to say: Just what is the question before us? We will decide the question before us. And with these other things, that will be worked out some other way, you know.

Well, as lawyers they are right, but it leaves a big hole in the contemporary world and in a world in which there are I don't know how many millions of refugees. All one needs is one slight change of events and there will be additional refugees in Algeria, French refugees. Just as there were Dutch refugees in Indonesia. In a world so full of people in such a fix, in a world of changing regimes, this is a very serious problem. I think it is something that ought to be faced.

Question: Sir, in regards to the retroactivity you indicated it is not much of a problem because this has been outlawed in other places, but inasmuch as he is being prosecuted under an Israeli statute I don't see how the fact that it's a crime in, shall we say, international law or may have been codified in another country would help eliminate the retroactive problem in the Israeli statute.

Professor Katz: I don't think it eliminates it. I suggested I think it affords an answer to it. I would like to try to answer your question under a legal system you and I are both familiar with, and that is our own. Let us assume there is a statute of New Jersey, New York, the Federal Government — I don't care which — providing that any war criminal found anywhere within New Jersey or coming within New Jersey shall be prosecuted for war crimes defined in accordance with established international legal doctrine. And let's assume the New Jersey statute were passed in 1950 and one of these fellows was found in New Jersey — and I'll eliminate kidnapping, you see—and he is prosecuted in New Jersey under that statute — and he challenges the statute under the Fourteenth Amendment.

What I would suggest to you is that, if New Jersey's argument were yes, this is a new statute, but this statute is a statute which in effect is equivalent to one that merely codifies the present existing common law, in this case it codifies not the ordinary present existing common law but it codifies war crimes which are a part of the law of nations, which by the Constitution of the United States, (Congress shall have power to punish, etc.) and which by well established precedent have been found to be punishable by the several states at least since — I haven't traced it back before 1750, but it goes back at least that far — I would suggest that the Supreme Court would say this does not violate the Constitution of the United States.

Now, as I say, it is a problem. It is not an open and shut case. But that is the way I would suggest it seems to me it would be answered.

Question: Professor Katz, I would like to address a question to the broader problem that you referred to generally, that of the development of world law to meet the question of elimination of armament, and so forth. You have suggested that we have a lot to do, case by case, and problem by problem. You have also suggested that there is a shortage of time. Is there any alternative to a development of a world common law? Is there something or is there some approach by way of legislation, world legislation or world constitutional development, revision of the U. N. Charter, anything along those lines you could suggest?

Professor Katz: I think it is possible, that is to say Governments could enter into international conventions, to establish doctrines of this sort. They could devise ways and means of enforcement.

Let me make one thing clear. I am not suggesting that all problems of disputes between states can ever be handled through law. We don't handle all disputes through law within our own country, the United States of America. There are plenty of cases where there are conflicts which are not ever settled through adjudication in any form. I suppose the most obvious is the strike, the labor disputes, where the law sets the limits within which the conflict takes place. No fraud, no violence, and so on. But within those limits we just leave it to be worked out.

I can give you another illustration which is less obvious but perhaps even more fundamental, and that's an election. In an election, we decide who shall exercise power within the United States. Now, theoretically, you could try to do that by adjudication. I can give you the formula. The formula will sound — and be — awfully silly. It isn't any sillier, I think, than some of the formulae that I have heard offered for eliminating war. You set up nine judges, eighteen, twenty-four, the best people in the country, set them up in a tribunal, and you give them a standard. You say: "We want you to pick as the President of the United States that man who is the wisest, the bravest, the truest, the most loyal, great patriot, the most experienced, the most patient, the strongest, et cetera. Those are the principles. Now you apply them."

Now, we all know perfectly well that that won't happen, it can't happen. We all know that the so-called principles there are just words, that a court can only apply principles to settle cases when the principles are such that every participant by and large understands them in substantially the same way. That is what common law does for us, and that is what statutory interpretation will do for us. By contrast, to set up a standard of "the wisest, the bravest, the truest", et cetera, makes no sense. It is not a standard people can apply. People will not accept the result. In an election system, there is struggle for power. We use propaganda, money, political warfare. We use everything except violence and fraud, which are outside the limits by law. Within these limits, the process works itself out.

I have a right in business to destroy you economically, by trying to do a better job of selling my goods than you can yours. I must operate within limits; no fraud, no monopoly, et cetera; but within those limits I can fight it out with you. In short, all societies recognize there are lots and lots of large disputes which cannot be resolved by adjudication, by their very nature.

What I have in mind as the job in front of us is this. In the first place, the larger the area of international disputes that you can bring within the sphere of law, the better chance you have of dealing with the rest of it through policy, diplomacy, negotation, and so on. The things which we deal with by processes like elections or like strikes or like business competition, these things are manageable in part because so much of it is covered by law that the rest is manageable. If you didn't have any legal system, none of these things would be manageable.

So our first problem is to find what can be handled through legal machinery. Beyond that, we have the additional problem of developing not law in the technical sense, but institutions and arrangements for coping with these things. And it will be tough. I am not suggesting that we should think of this in terms of millenium. Remember the United States of America was a hundred years old when we fell apart in the bloodiest war we ever had, the Civil War. There can be no guaranty in any constitutional arrangement against that. We became a republic in 1789 — it wasn't a hundred years, it was seventy when we found that we couldn't handle things except through a war, and we fell apart. If you go through the history of the Roman Empire you find that from 180 A.D., when the second of the Antonines died, to the time of Diocletian, about 30°, about 120 years, the life expectancy of a Roman emperor during that period I think was nine months. And they fell, you see, because wars were going on all the time. They were called civil wars, they were called revolutions. But they smell as sweet by any name.

And, as I say, I am not talking about rearing back and passing miracles. I am saying that the more of this we can bring within law, the better chance we have of handling the rest of it in an approximately sensible way. And the imagination which goes into the legal system can also go into the development of institutions and arrangements. And when I said let each of us do what he can, I wasn't offering that as an adequate substitute for divine intervention. I was saying merely that as mortal men, we have the good fortune to be able to do what we can. By and large, that's as far as we can get; and most of us don't even get that far. That's all I meant by that.

Question: In the area of retroactivity, is an additional problem posed for you by the fact that Israel did not exist as a state when these acts were committed?

Professor Katz: I think it's an additional problem, yes. I wouldn't feel it was unmanageable. Supposing Alaska adopted that New Jersey statute I was talking about a moment ago. Well, you know, Alaska has been a state a short time. It doesn't seem to me to be really a hurdle, although it is a genuine problem. I think it has to be faced.

"Now We Have Everything"

It was a red-letter day for Zipora Markowitz, aged sixty-five years, the day the Golden Age Club opened in Acre, the ancient crusader town. Not only did the club give new purpose to her and to her ailing husband; but it also brought them a new home, a solid concrete cottage with a little garden, a far cry from the miserable shack in which they had lived since their arrival in Israel in 1956.

Zipora, an energetic and dignified old lady, was one of those who survived the Nazi years in Europe. Her husband, formerly head-cashier of a metal plant in Galtnz, Rumania, emerged from three long years in a concentration camp suffering from high blood pressure and arteriosclerosis. Thanks to Zipora's fortitude and devotion, he survived repeated surgery in hospitals of Malben-JDC, the Joint Distribution Committee's medical and social program for Israel's new immigrants. Malben, like other aspects of its overseas programs, receives its funds from the United Jewish Appeal.

Zipora never complained, cheerfully eked out her income from national old age insurance grants with baby-sitting jobs here and there. When the Golden Age Club, sponsored by the municipality of Acre and Malben-JDC, opened, Zipora was there, one of the first to join. And soon she emerged as a leader in the club's social and cultural programs; for in addition to her boundless energy, she was one of those who naturally concerned herself with the problems of others, and her fluency in many languages helped her bring people together. They came to her with so many troubles that she tended to forget her own, of which the toughest was her housing problem.

Last year, however, the club management decided to do something for those who lived in inferior conditions. They inspected members' homes, found Zipora and her husband in their damp, dilapidated quarters and decided: "This couple deserves to be the first to benefit from our housing scheme."

New homes were constructed for aged immigrants either as cottages or on the ground floors of apartment buildings, to avoid their having to climb hazardous stairs. The homes are self-contained: bed-living room, hall, bathroom, kitchen, and balcony. They are fully furnished, and they are rent — and tax-free. The municipality's social worker and the special employment exchange for elderly persons provide part-time home occupations, to augment the old-age pensions which elderly persons receive. The ailing receive part-time housekeeper services. In all this Malben-JDC cooperates with know-how and financial aid.

Now the Markowitzes feel they have been born anew. "If our faith in life has been restored, it is mainly thanks to Malben-JDC which has taken such good care of us since the day we came to Israel", says Zipora. "This new home, so near our club, is like a gift from heaven. Now we have everything!"

Israel On The Threshold Of A New Decade Of Challenge And Development

BY DR. JOSEPH J. SCHWARTZ, OF NEW YORK, VICE-PRESIDENT OF STATE OF ISRAEL BONDS

The dramatic events of the past year, particularly those which were unfolded in a Jerusalem court room, have revealed to us in startling fashion the ability of the surviving remnant of our people to rise from the ashes of destruction in Europe and by superhuman effort to convert wholesale disaster into amazing rebirth in Israel. Thus as we have celebrated the Bar Mitzvah of Israel this year, its thirteenth, we have also been made to see its role in providing guarantees for a Jewish future that will be free from a recurrence of the devastation and genocide cruelly practiced on our people under Hitler.

The flowering of Israel has been a boon to the Jewish people throughout the world. In recent times it has offered repeated evidence of giving substance to the aspirations we have associated with Israel from the very beginning of the movement for its establishment as an independent state. Inherent in its progress has been the striving not only to be of spiritual and material aid to Jews, but also to be of service to mankind in general.

Among the major events of importance this year was the celebration of the tenth anniversary of the establishment of the State of Israel Bond Organization. In the scope of its impact on Israel's economic development, this anniversary, too, has had far-reaching significance for the Jewish people. It may well be said that while Israel's existence as an independent state goes back thirteen years, its economic history began with the launching of the first Israel Bond Issue in the United States ten years ago.

It took courage as well as vision to plan an Israel Bond drive in 1950 and to launch it in 1951. This was the time when Israel had still not recovered from the war of independence, which brought widespread damage to the country and which cost so much, not only financially, but in precious human life. This was a time when Israel was staggering under the welcome burden, but burden nevertheless, of mass immigration, when the immigrants were streaming into the country at the rate of 15,000 and 20,000 a month. This was the time when conditions were desperate. Food and other necessities were rationed. Makeshift shelters were everywhere. Industry lacked raw materials, agriculture lacked water, and development was only a dream.

And yet, in those critical and dangerous days, Prime Minister Ben-Gurion and his colleagues in the Government had the vision to realize that the only thing that could build a viable economy in Israel was investment capital; that this had to be undertaken at all costs and in the face of all warnings that it couldn't possibly succeed. Certainly the history of the past decade has fully justified the decision that was made. During the past ten years, more than $500,000,000 has been invested in State of Israel Bonds. Through Israel Bonds, American Jews have shared in the establishment of new industries, the building of thousands of permanent dwellings, the opening of new irrigation projects, the construction of oil pipelines, new harbors, railways, communications, and shipping, as well as the exploitation of the natural resources in the Negev.

Finance Minister Eshkol of Israel has summed it up in this way: "There are Israel Bond dollars in every mile of road, in every link of the pipeline, in every orange, in every drop of water, in every factory, farm and public housing project throughout Israel. With the help of these Israel Bond dollars, the face of the land is being transformed, from the gray rockiness of neglected wastes to the lush greens and rich browns of fertile farms, from the emptiness of abandoned hills and valleys to villages, towns and thriving cities."

All this did not happen by accident. Rather, it was the result of vision, determination and purposeful planning. The history of the past decade teaches us that the progress of Israel can be moved forward if all of us recognize the values of our heritage, and if all of us keep before our eyes the image of Israel as seen by the pioneers. The image of Israel today is an image of dynamic economic development. And Israel Bonds have played an indispensable role in the realization of that image.

Yet, over and above the impact of these Bonds on Israel's economic future, there is the one important element of a united effort which has brought all Jewish communities closer to Israel and closer to one another. For in Israel Bonds we are joined in a combined enterprise of a positive nature, whose meaning for our own lives as Jews is as profound, I believe, as its meaning in terms of concrete achievement within Israel itself. The State of Israel, once a dream, has now made realists of us all. As realists, then, we see both the achievements and the fact that the goal of economic independence has not yet been reached.

Israel still faces the need to carry forward historic tasks in economic development and the absorption of the immigrants who continue to come to her shores. In Israel a new development frontier must be opened up to mass settlement. The vast stretches of the Negev desert are the challenge of the next ten years, the second decade of the Israel Bond drive. We must make certain that the flow of Israel Bond funds continues at a maximum rate.

The opening up of new areas of settlement constitutes an immediate and major task because the rate of immigration has jumped considerably during the past six months. Immigrants have been coming into Israel during recent years at the rate of approximately 23,600 a year. The sharp increase in the first half of 1961 indicates that the flow of newcomers will exceed the expected total of 30,000 for the calendar year. As in the early days of the Israel Bond drive when immigration was at its peak, the State of Israel will require very substantial funds for settlement, housing and industrial development to absorb the newcomers on a self-sustaining basis.

When we speak of Israel's future, it is well to remember that with American Jewry's economic assistance during the past ten years, the State of Israel has achieved world-wide recognition as a vital center of democracy and as an outstanding laboratory of social and scientific progress. No one has expressed Israel's aspirations more eloquently than Prime Minister Ben-Gurion, who said at the recent celebration of the tenth anniversary of Israel Bonds:

"All our efforts and hopes in Israel rest upon two pillars: (1) The message of our prophets, of brotherhood, peace among the nations, justice and liberty; (2) The discoveries in the spheres of science and technology.

The prophets taught us what we must do and it is from science that we learn how to do it."

In the elections that were held in Israel last month, we saw once more the vitality of its democratic system of government and the passionate dedication of its people to the principles of human freedom. In another and more spectacular development, the firing of its first weather rocket, Israel demonstrated her scientific coming of age, giving notice to the entire world that she has achieved a stage of technological development that entitles her to share in harnessing the forces of science for the good of humanity and for world peace.

In considering the progress that has been made possible during the past decade through the Israel Bond Organization as Israel's foremost instrument for economic growth, we can take pride in the fact that not size or numbers, but skill and idealism have determined Israel's hopes for the future.

As it enters its second decade, the Israel Bond drive represents our partnership in the future of Israel, a partnership between Israel and the Jewish communities of the free world. We must maintain this partnership until the land of Israel and the people of Israel have been fully redeemed; until Israel is made secure in its freedom and sovereignty, political and economic; and until the spirit of our people has been liberated to resume its creative march across the pages of history.

DISCLOSURES UNFOLDED IN EICHMANN TRIAL

ders crept into my statements at the police interrogation. I did not have at my disposal at that time all the documents. Can I refresh my memory and give answers which more or less tally with the reality of those days, which had already faded into oblivion?"

Similarly, the accused man blunted with his replies the questions put to him concerning the tape recordings said to have been made in Argentina by a Dutch journalist, Wilhelm Sassen, only a fraction of which has been admitted in evidence at this trial because of insufficient proof that they represented what Eichmann really said, reports the New York Herald Tribune. Eichmann stuck to his story that the transcript of these recordings was a jumble of distortions, even though he did try, he said, to make corrections in his own handwriting.

Concerning the so-called Nisko Plan, a scheme was tried out tentatively for resettling of Jews at a place in Poland called Nisko. The Israeli prosecutor tried to get admissions that the defendant sent the victims there naked and penniless, with the purpose of bringing about their deaths.

Eichmann insisted this was untrue, and that the Nisko Plan was conceived in order to allow the Jews to live in the area freely, and that he "associated myself with this idea enthusiastically."

W. J. C. Booklet Lists Eichmann Aides, Camps, Jewish Losses

Only three of Eichmann's principal aides have paid the supreme penalty for their part in the mass murder of European Jews, according to the World Jewish Congress in New York. Siegfried Seidl, member of Eichmann's Hungarian Commando, and Anton Brunner, Eichmann's Deputy in Vienna, were both executed in Austria. Dieter Wisliceny was executed in Slovakia where he had been Eichmann's assistant. The World Jewish Congress, in a new publication, "Eichmann's Confederates and the Third Reich Hierarchy," names 54 members of Eichmann's key staff which totalled about 100.

Six are under arrest and awaiting trial, four in West Germany and two in Austria. They are: Erich Deppner and Wilhelm Zoepf, who served in The Hague; Otto Hunsche and Hermann Krumey, who served in Hungary, all held in West Germany; Franz Slavik and Kurt Franz Novak, Eichmann's transportation chief, arrested in Austria.

One of the 54, Theodor Dannecker, committed suicide in prison. Four are known to be free: Walter Rauff, chief of mobile gas chambers, believed to be in the Middle East; Alfred Hartl, and two others, Barbier and Schmidtsiefen, also reported alive in Germany. Alois Brunner, Eichmann's representative in Greece, France, and Slovakia, is believed to be in hiding in Syria. Two members of the Hungarian Commando, Slotke and Alfred Slavik, are known to have gone underground. Three others are in prison: Franz Fischer and Ferdinand aus der Fuenten, both serving life sentences in Holland, and a man named Bauer, who received a 10-year term in Germany.

Dr. Nehemiah Robinson, director of the World Jewish Congress' Institute of Jewish Affairs, names 34 of Eichmann's men whose whereabouts or fate are unknown. One of them is his secretary, Fritz Martin. A second man, Franz Abromeit, is assumed to have been captured by the Russians. In all, Dr. Robinson lists about 750 Nazi officials and their fate, including Cabinet Ministers, Ambassadors, Military Chiefs, S.S. personnel, key officials in charge of concentration camps, high government and Nazi party officials, police chiefs, and Nazis responsible for carrying out medical experiments on helpless concentration camp victims.

The W.J.C. official states that the lists were compiled from a variety of sources, and notes that a person's inclusion in the lists "does not necessarily mean that he committed a crime within the meaning of criminal law." The 60-page booklet gives a description of the basic arms of the Third Reich, as well as a detailed map and a description of the best known concentration and annihilation camps which numbered hundreds.

There is also a list of Jewish losses in Europe at Hitler's hands, totalling 5,717,000.

Poland, 2,900,000; Soviet Union, 1,000,000; Russia, 420,000; Czechoslovakia, 300,000; Germany, 200,000; Hungary, 200,000; Lithuania, 135,000; France, 130,000; Holland, 120,000; Latvia, 85,000; Yugoslavia, 65,000; Greece, 60,000; Austria, 40,000; Belgium, 40,000; Italy, 15,000; Bulgaria, 7,000.

This total of 5,717,000 was 68 per cent of the Jewish population of the countries concerned. Omitted from the list are the smaller figures for Norway, Luxembourg, and Denmark.

The new World Jewish Congress publication is available at 15 East 84 Street, New York 28, N.Y.
